The river at this place is very high and consequently the lake is gradually getting higher as the water is coming from above and backing up below where there is a large ditch which was made several years ago in order to drain the lake.

The farmers cannot get to thresh their wheat as there is so much rain and the river overflowing so many fields.

Albert Hoover lost his entire crop of wheat by the river also C. Dickerson lost wheat.

Standing on the bluff near Grand Pass and looking over the bottom a person observes a picture long to be remembered. Extra fine fields of green corn, golden sheaves of wheat all interspersed with bright gleaming water. Water which means so much to farmers who are powerless to divert the loss they most assuredly will have.

At such times as this a person is more than ever made to realize how dependent we are on God's goodness and mercy. Yet He never deserts us.

PICKETT'S CHARGE

AT GETTYSBURG

The Greatest Event in One of the World's Greatest Battles Graphically Told by the General's Widow at Our Chautauqua.

The Redpath-Vawter System and its patrons are alike fortunate in the engagement of Mrs. Lasalle Corbett Pickett for the season of 1909. She represents on the lecture platform that intangible something that all newspapers, magazines and platform seek, which belongs to and touches all our common humanity and which we call for lack of a better term, "human interest." She is a charming lady, with the beautiful memory of a brave and noble man. She comes with a laurel wreath to hang above his grave.

There is but one Pickett in history the beau sabreur who saluted Lee on the fateful field of Gettysburg and asked for the order to charge. The fate of two republics hung upon Lee's nod that sent Pickett forward in the most magnificent and desperate infantry charge of all history. When the triple lines of gray moved to the attack across the historic meadows the genius of history rode on their bayonets and hovered over the thin blue line that manned the intrenched hills before them. When they reeled back, broken and decimated and dying, but unconquered and unconquerable, the Confederacy died. No more devoted men combed their hair as they smiled into the face of death at Thermopylae or laughed in the mouths of cannon at Delaplava than Pickett and his men. And so Pickett became history and of the grandeur of history.

It is his wife who comes to tell the story of her husband; the girl who married a soldier older than she and watched him go to battle with a heart gripped by fear, but soothed by the knowledge that he was hers true as Bayard to every trust, a knight of the Eighteenth century. To Lasalle Corbett Pickett the prince of her girl's dreams and the husband of her widowhood lives as truly as though he moved by her side. Her story of her hero is sublime in its pathos and tenderness. It is part of the greatness of a great epoch and grips us as we listen with an intimate and personal interest in the man, the time and the women who waited at home. It is the vitagraph of many lives with one grand central figure glorified, a picture of human love and hope and suffering hung upon the walls of the temple of fate.

In thrilling, absorbing interest, in touching tenderness and true pathos, no platform attraction excels Mrs. Pickett. Her personality charms. She is magnetic, with the magnetism of the true woman; for Lasalle Corbett Pickett is to womanliness what her knight was to manhood.

AIDING DIGESTION BY EXERCISE.

Digestion is not an exclusively chemical process, depending upon the secretion of saliva, gastric fluid, bile and other liquids, nor altogether a mental process. Though depending largely upon the mental state, it is, to a large extent, physical. Two dogs were fed alike; one after following a carriage several hours, had not digested the meal to an appreciable degree; the other, lying in its kennel, had completely digested it. Gentle exercise is favorable, severe physical exercise unfavorable. A few minutes' rest after eating facilitates digestion.

The character of digestion depends largely upon the motor activity of the stomach and intestine. If exercise is neglected, the stomach may become "flabby" and retain food unduly. Milk and eggs are especially injurious in this case, uncooked food best—even though cereal starch be included, which is largely indigestible. Persons of sedentary occupation and nervous women, especially, are liable to this condition. The remedy is, of course, general exercise to tone the entire system and special remedial exercises. Moderate horseback riding is obviously good, as are those movement exercises that strengthen the abdominal muscles.
